A personal view of the team performance

We as a team were able to manage our project by putting our ideas for the project together by prototyping individual designs for the website and discussing what we liked about each other's design. After that, I created a team digital prototype on Figma, where I combined our design together and showed how each page will be linked to another. This helped us to see a slight vision of the website and helped us figure out what roles we would need to assign each other. We went on to divide different roles for everyone so that everyone had a clear idea about what they would be working on. We ensured each other that if anyone get stuck, they can ask for help from any team member.

Everyone contributed to the building of the website; everyone had specific roles to work on. I took one section for the web pages. For example, I worked on the Asian cuisine detailed page and subpages. I also helped with creating a template for the café section as well as working on Word documents. While completing my work I helped my other team members and gave suggestions about the part they were working on. This was to make sure that the website overall looked the same when put together at the end. We, as a team, meet in lessons and discuss our work on our WhatsApp group. This was used as the main source of communication if anyone was stuck on anything they would send a quick text asking about the issue and let each other know how far along they are with their work, to keep other team members in the loop.

Some deadlines were met but some were not, it was because, at the start of the semester, not everyone was able to come to lessons and did not fully understand what they were meant to do, which put us as a team slightly behind. However, we were able to catch up in the mid-term holidays, and I was happy with the effort and work that every team member put in to complete this assignment. To improve further as a team, I would say we would have been able to add some video to the website to make it look aesthetic so more users could be attracted to the design.

Critique of the website

For the website, we made a few changes to our plan, which was created last semester. We changed the site plan of the website, and a few asset changes were made to improve the user interface and user experience. We changed the site plan because it was complicated to read and would have been hard for users to navigate. So, we only took important parts of it to create the final website. To make the webpage attractive, we changed one of the fonts because it was not going well with the rest of the website. By making these few changes, we as a team could build an attractive, accessible, usable, and responsive website that meets the user's needs and the client's business requirements.
